_ Tools _ The primary tool for image manipulation is the lasso tool. It allows you to grab a section of pixels and perform some kind of alteration or manipulation on the current layer. You can move and resize the image through a variety of tools, including the move, transform, and transform tools and crop tool. The lasso tool can be toggled on or off with the Alt/Opt key. You can draw any kind of shape on the image and then select it with the lasso tool. There are two varieties of the lasso tool—the selection lasso tool and the magic wand tool. The selection lasso tool is useful when you want to select an object or area in an image and then make alterations to that specific portion of the image, while the magic wand tool is great for quickly selecting a large portion of an image and performing its own kind of alteration on the image. Figure 6-1 shows the lasso tool set to the position of the magic wand. Click once with the magic wand tool to select the lasso tool and press the Alt/Opt key to toggle the lasso tool on. Figure 6-2 shows the magic wand tool's options, which are toggled on with the Alt/Opt key. Figure 6-1 The Alt/Opt key toggles the lasso tool on and off. Figure 6-2 The Alt/Opt key toggles the magic wand tool on and off. Let's look at a little bit more about these tools and how you can use them to perform basic image adjustments. ## Create a New Layer There's no rule that says you need to modify an image as a group of layers. By creating new layers, you can cut the image into pieces and manipulate it individually, which is often more desirable than rearranging and editing an entire layer with many other layers layered on top. The layer command is a window that allows you to create, save, and view a new layer; to move, resize, and flip a layer; and to apply filters. To create a new layer, use the layer command to open the New Layer dialog (Figure 6-3). The New Layer dialog box has three tabs: Layers, Transparency, and Adjustments, along with a Settings button. Figure 6-3 The New Layer dialog box.

The following sections discuss these features in detail. Adjustments The Adjustment tool allows you to make adjustments to the image as a whole, such as brightness, contrast, noise, and more. You can apply these adjustments with the Adjustment brush or with the Adjustment Layers (see Editing layers). Adjustment brush The Adjustment brush can be used to quickly apply adjustments to your photo, such as brightness, contrast and so on. Click in the Adjustment brush tool (that looks like an “M”) to load the brush with an adjustment, or press Ctrl/Cmd + A (Windows)/⌘ + A (Mac) to access the brush with an adjustment. You can also choose to add multiple adjustments to the brush by holding down the shift key and clicking each adjustment in turn. Note that you can apply most adjustments to the entire image at the same time, or you can use some adjustments to “tweak” specific areas of an image, such as an area of a photo where there is a bright or dim area. If you click and hold on a layer in the layers panel, you can use the Adjustment brush or the Adjustment Layers to apply an adjustment to the entire layer, or the Adjustment brush can be used to apply the adjustment to only a portion of the layer. Stigmas of psychiatric disorders often serve as obstacles in the diagnostic process. Such overt labeling, in the form of stereotypes such as "mad," "sick," or "crazy," may influence attitudes and treatment decisions. Research has linked psychiatric disorders with stigma, which can have detrimental effects on service access and quality of life. For many people, however, stigma can be a benign phenomenon, facilitating understanding. Stigma can be both negative and positive, depending on the stigma and the person and their interaction with the stigma. When a stigma is well known and well-deserved, it may enhance appreciation of the disorder in the same individual. The long-term goal is to determine how individuals can adjust positively to psychiatric disorders and engage in effective treatment. Public stigma, particularly related to major depression, may serve as a barrier to help-seeking and medical treatment. One strategy to address public stigma might be to convey information about the disorder to the public in a positive manner. Many depressed people who have difficulty managing their condition may find benefit from learning about their disorder and the available treatment options. Positive expectations about treatment, associated with treatment engagement, can motivate and promote treatment adherence. Thus, the aim of the proposed study is to study how depressed individuals can effectively learn about, and make more positive treatment-related expectancies in response to, information about depression and its treatments. This aim, along with informing related research on public stigma, may be achieved by studying expectations of benefits, treatment risks, and costs of treatment, as well as outcomes expected to result from receiving treatment. The proposed research has three specific aims: 1) To study how individuals with mild, moderate, and severe depressive symptoms learn about their depression and what information and sources they use to learn; 2) To examine how individuals with mild, moderate, and severe depressive symptoms make positive and negative expectancies about depression and its treatment; 3) To study the effect of making positive versus negative expectancies about depression and its treatments on feelings of stigma, as well as attitudes toward and knowledge of depression and its treatment.
