Fuel dispensers (e.g., a gas station pump) are commonly used to dispense fuel for an engine of a vehicle. The fuel is dispensed into a fuel tank. A vapor return system (e.g., a vent line) of the fuel dispenser typically returns vapors to a fuel storage tank or holding tank. Fuel dispensers may include manual dispensers and automated dispensers. In addition, one or more fuel dispensers may be part of a dispenser network. As part of the dispenser network, multiple fuel dispensers may be coupled to a common communication network and the communication network may communicate data associated with the fuel dispenser, such as parameters associated with the fuel dispenser, parameters associated with the vehicle that is being serviced, and/or other related data. In certain cases, a fuel dispenser or the communication network may determine that the fuel dispenser has a problem, such as a low fuel pressure problem, leak in the fuel dispenser, and the like. As such, the communication network may determine that the fuel dispenser is running out of fuel, such as an overfill condition, and so on. However, the communication network may not be able to determine that fuel flow from the fuel dispenser is blocked. For example
