If you need to recover a broken partition, Windows usually won't have your partition. You'll need either a third party recovery solution like Active@ Partition Recovery (freeware, $24.99), or a $70 to $350 partitioning tool like EaseUS Partition Master, Disk Management, or Partition Juggler. But you don't have to break the bank to recover a partition - Active@ Partition Recovery is freeware so you can give it a try for free. When you launch it for the first time, you'll see a welcome page with instructions. Read them and try it, there's no harm in trying (if you don't like the program, just uninstall it). Things you should know: Active@ Partition Recovery is not a full-featured partitioning program. It won't allow you to edit partition tables. It's not that much hard for a non-expert to use, but I really recommend you to use a better partitioning program. Believe it or not, a very common task on a Windows computer is to recover hard drive space lost to a virus, partition accident, backup error, and other such mishaps. To perform this trick, you will need to use either Free or Pro version of Active@ Partition Recovery. However, I would recommend Free version because it has fewer features. The program can recover "deleted" partitions, but it cannot recover "corrupted" partitions, since Windows doesn't recognize this partition. The resulting solution of cyclodextrins is then worked up by various techniques to separate the desired water-soluble cyclodextrin from the waste material. More recently, the cyclodextrin production process has been driven towards the use of enzymatic hydrolysis of starch to remove the starch granules and to dissolve out the starch into a solution of cyclodextrins. Since starch contains not only the desired α and β cyclodextrins, but also other cyclodextrin inclusion complexes, as well as large amounts of amylose, protein, and grit, it has been difficult to separate, for example, the desired α -cyclodextrin from the other components. The use of enzymes in the cyclodextrin production process has therefore alleviated, but not eliminated, the need to separate the desired α -cyclodextrin from the other components of the hydrolysate of starch. In the production of the β -cyclodextrin, it has been found that the higher alcohols obtained from natural sources have a higher cyclodextrin yield, and that the saccharification of starches using more suitable enzymes at low temperatures leads to a higher yield of β -cyclodextrin.
