Congenital arcuate keratoderma with pattern dystrophic linear markings: a case report. Congenital arcuate keratoderma with pattern dystrophic linear markings is a rare autosomal dominant disorder. Here we report a 15-year-old boy with the novel features of a linear pattern of brownish thickening, elevated palms, generalized hyperkeratosis of the dorsal hand, and mild learning difficulties. Family history was negative for the disorder. Similarity of the pattern to the typical pattern of congenital ichthyosiform erythroderma and the linear and whorl-like pattern of congenital seborrhic keratoderma, but with a different distribution was stressed. Although rarely used outside of Russia and former Soviet republics, the design remains one of the best-selling rifles in the world. History The origin of the AK-47 is unknown, although several theories exist. Russian born inventor Mikhail Kalashnikov wished to create a weapon that was "a good value for money", and intended to bring the latest Soviet equipment to the Soviet Army in the Second World War, with a scope mounted with the weapon. He began to develop the weapon in January 1947, first producing a prototype in the Soviet Union in February the same year, and began production of the weapon in the USSR's Tula Arsenal in February 1949. He bought a fully automatic variant from the Norinco state-owned plant in China and began working on the repair and production of ammunition for it.
