Image copyright Getty Images Rising costs are hurting Britain's small businesses, according to a survey released in Davos. The survey, by research firm Ipsos Mori, says costs such as rent and wages are leaving many businesses under pressure. The survey, of small businesses of 25 to 100 employees, found they are also struggling with slower growth than last year. Chief executive of the British Chambers of Commerce, John Longworth, said the survey was "a wake-up call". David McQueen, senior economist at the BCC, said: "A chilling fact from the survey is the money worries that have so worried business owners this year - with rising costs and lower growth further eroding the bottom line." The report said the average profits of British small firms were 4.4% lower than a year ago. Last year, it said, the survey found an "unprecedented" 68% of small firms said rising costs were their number one problem, and now 68% said the same. But only one in 10 of those polled said they expected to increase their profits this year, compared with 22% who expected to decrease their profits. David Spicer, business development manager at the Chartered Institute of Management Accountants, said: "This survey highlights that small business is in the firing line, as far as cost pressures are concerned." He said the survey's findings were "an important reminder of the pain small business owners are feeling and the challenges they are facing", adding: "Small businesses can't afford to sit on their hands. They are continuing to take cost-cutting measures, but they need to focus on sales in order to boost their businesses." But speaking in Davos, the BBC's business editor, Kamal Ahmed, said there was a "sense of business as usual" in the Swiss ski resort. "The feeling here is that the Davos World Economic Forum, and all the major international economic events, remain business as usual. "Nothing has really changed since last year. That is why you see large gatherings of big business and politicians, and the usual speeches about how
