If I have a web service (ASP.Net Web API) that returns me external api, will the user who is making the request on his client application (iOS/Android) hit the throttling limit as well? If so, how can we avoid it? A: Yes, but not with any reasonable responses. You do not have to be worried about whether you will fail an existing request or exceed latency bounds as those are configurable on the web service end. The client will hit the throttling limit before the web service ever starts sending any messages over the wire. If a request hits your web service over 3 seconds, it may well not even get there before your API is consumed by another client. You have bigger problems to address, but you do not need to worry about a bunch of tiny $5/month clients setting load on your API. If you have a fast web service, and you're willing to pay a few hundred or even thousands for a more reliable service, a load balancer isn't going to help you. Even if you bought a load balancer, you're still limited to a relatively small number of simultaneous connections to enable it to work properly. A web service should respond to around in environments that are reminiscent of a comic book. A grand story of power and empire, complete with heroes, villain, corruption, love, betrayal, and many more. Effects of repeated intracerebral bicuculline injections on quisqualate-induced behaviour in rats. To study the influence of bicuculline (BIC) on its own behavioural effects, repeated intracerebral injections of BIC were carried out and quisqualate (QUIS)-induced behaviour was studied in rats. BIC injection (10 micrograms) was accompanied by a minor elevation in body temperature of the rats, an ipsilateral tail-flick response to heat stimulation and an increase in the duration of the righting reflex. Repeated BIC injections (3 x 10 micrograms) enhanced the behavioural responses induced by 3.75 micrograms QUIS, but not by 4.0 micrograms. Morphine (1 mg/kg) or diazepam (5 mg/kg) significantly decreased the righting reflex evoked by 5.0 micrograms QUIS in rats previously injected with BIC. After repeated BIC injections, the (1-10 Hz) synaptic potentials induced by QUIS (3.75 micrograms) were suppressed for up to 6 days. This suppressed potential could be fully reversed by 5.0 micrograms QUIS. These findings suggest that the QUIS-induced behavioural changes in rats are a consequence of changes in the synaptic efficacy.

Nasal chemosensory function in asthmatic subjects. Nasal chemosensory function was studied in eight non-atopic control subjects and 20 asthmatic subjects. There was no significant difference in the sensitivity of each subject to the chemical stimulants tested between the two groups. The nasal volume threshold of subjects with allergic rhinitis was lower than that of the non-atopic control subjects.

Nasal airway resistance and responsiveness to all chemical stimulants studied were also higher in the allergic rhinitis patients. These findings show that nasal airway resistance is not a major factor in the development of allergic rhinitis. The low nasal volume threshold for all stimulants was thought to be due to the constricted and congested nasal airway of the allergic rhinitis patients.
