After spending a lot of time with OpenGL, I've found myself frustrated by some of the 'quirks' of using a two-headed API. Then it occurred to me that it might be possible to combine metal and OpenGL to provide some of the benefits of one without all of the pain of the other. For instance, gl_TextureID seems like a potential source of issues when using OpenGL ES (I don't know if Metal has similar quirkiness). Whereas when performing Metal, it'd be possible to create a pool of textures to get around the problem. I'm fairly new to Metal, so I'm a bit surprised there isn't any good documentation regarding how to integrate OpenGL into Metal. If anyone has any information about how that works I'd appreciate some pointers. A: The only problem you'll have with Metal and OpenGL is that they target different backends. To use a Metal-texture within your OpenGL application, you'll have to call certain functions (like glTexStorage or glPixelStorei) on the OpenGL context, but those are all covered in GLSL. If you'd be more interested in calling Metal-backed functions, you'd have to use Metal on the GPU side. If you want to combine Metal and OpenGL, it's not actually necessary to take this route, it's just that I can't really imagine that the integration is too complicated to figure out on your own. If you want to simply use Metal, then you have two options: Have your OpenGL code call into the Metal framework's functions directly. This might be more
