The principle implies that where a situation has been established that may lead to genocide, crimes against humanity, ethnic cleansing, apartheid or crimes of apartheid, there is the possibility that that situation can be dealt with by state or international judges. The principle of universal jurisdiction applies to cases where the situation is so serious that it affects the entire world community. This was demonstrated in the case of a trial of a war criminal by a French court in 1998. On 7 March 2010, the International Criminal Court (ICC) began its investigation into the situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) for genocide and other crimes allegedly committed by the government of President Joseph Kabila. Kabila's government denies that any crimes have taken place. In its January 2011 report, the UNHRC concluded that "the current electoral process being conducted under the leadership of the government is a mere farce which is both fraudulent and lacking in credibility". The body also called for UN troops to monitor and facilitate an "independent and credible" investigation. On 6 February, the UN Security Council adopted a 6d1f23a050
