Twelve tests for detecting staphylococcal enterotoxin B-induced septic shock. We performed a prospective clinical trial in which we studied the early diagnostic and therapeutic capabilities of the currently available methods for detecting staphylococcal enterotoxin B-induced septic shock. Sixty adult patients with suspected staphylococcal enterotoxin B-induced septic shock were enrolled in the study. Patients were assigned to one of two groups: septic shock (n=30) patients who met the clinical criteria of systemic inflammatory response syndrome and sepsis with sustained hypotension or lactic acidosis and septic shock (n=30) patients who did not meet the clinical criteria of systemic inflammatory response syndrome and sepsis. At the onset of the trial, venous blood and urine were collected for detection of Escherichia coli antibodies by enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay, C-reactive protein, procalcitonin, and white blood cell count measurements by automated blood counters, and cultures for staphylococci by incubation for 24 hours at 37 degrees C in blood and urine samples. Blood and urine levels of E. coli antibodies, procalcitonin, and white blood cell count in patients with systemic inflammatory response syndrome and sepsis were significantly higher than in healthy individuals (P
