Electrical stimulation of the stomach may be used, for example, to produce a sensation of fullness or to temporarily reduce the motility of the stomach (an anti-motility or gastric inhibitory peptide effect). Electrical stimulation of the stomach may also be used to treat obesity, diabetes, and other metabolic disorders. In some cases, stimulators may be implanted within a patient and left in place indefinitely. In some cases, temporary stimulators may be implanted and removed after treatment is completed. One type of previously-known implantable stimulator employs an electrolytic capacitor to provide a
