Figures 1 and 2 illustrate the most common failure modes that may occur in a wind turbine. Figure 1 shows a shear deformation of a turbine blade during operation. When a wind turbine blade encounters extreme adverse weather conditions, such as a hurricane or earthquake, surface cracks develop in the surface of a blade or in a critical area between the. A noticeable reduction in the performance of the wind turbine may also be an indication of the cause of the blade crack. In most cases, this type of crack is caused by a structural anomaly and visual inspection of the turbine blade would normally suggest the cause of the failure. A sound turbine blade should be inspected visually, and a fault in a blade should be corrected. However, if the fault exists in the blade root or blade shroud, it should be repaired to prevent further damage to the blade. Figure 2 shows an example of a broken blade root during manufacture. The majority of this type of faulting will occur at the blade installation stage and visual inspection would not normally detect this type of fault. A When a wind turbine blade fails during operation, its failure may be related to operational faults, such as loss of electrical power or lack of pitch stability. If the blade failure is related to operational faults, the failure should be considered an operational failure of the wind turbine. When visual inspection of the wind turbine blade fails to detect the cause of
