Hackers made off with £1million from NHS Digital - despite being caught on camera - by using the software to access NHS England's computers. They installed a program so sophisticated that an expert would have been needed to use it. Security firm Group-IB said that one of the hackers boasted that he had previously accessed a 'top secret' server. The company traced the crime to a man who lives in Russia, who has been put on international wanted lists by Interpol. Researchers said that the hackers made off with the equivalent of £400,000 every two days for the 18 months that they were active. The attack was made possible because of a mix up by NHS Digital - which is responsible for managing the NHS's computers. The responsibility for the service passed from the Department of Health to the NHS last year and NHS Digital is now the body responsible for the UK's health records. It was not until this year that the NHS discovered the hack because it was left off the list of people they were supposed to be in contact with. Experts believe that the hackers used the software to access NHS England's computers The hackers made off with the equivalent of £400,000 every two days for 18 months from June 2014 until August last year. Police are now investigating how the hackers managed to get into the NHS Digital's system. It is thought that someone at the organisation found a way in to the network and updated the system with the malware. The hacked system has been taken offline and the healthcare organisation is now examining all of its security systems. The NHS added that it was 'working to minimise the impact on patients' records'. An NHS Digital spokesman said that the hack would not be 'damaging for patient care, we are confident the [National Health Service Information Centre] is
