With the growth in popularity of computing devices such as smart phones, tablets and smartphones there has also been a substantial growth in social media. As a result, now more than ever, many of our day-to-day interactions are carried out via a variety of online-based networks (e.g., Twitter®). However, there are many risks associated with such social media interactions. For example, as many of the networks provide a relatively open platform for posting content, a variety of comments can be made about others. Like many other social media activity, however, online-based discussions via social networks can sometimes be subject to the “filter bubble” effect. This effect is where individuals within the social media environment that are most like-minded are provided with a disproportionate amount of views on posts and comments from their “friends”. This can cause problems in finding objective information that the individual may need. For example, a user who is applying for a job may see that their peers in the network have received an interview request from the company they would like to work for. However, if the user is not currently working, for whatever reason, the user may not know whether that company has a physical office location at that time. As a result, some users may have difficulty seeing whether or not the company that they would like to work for is actually available at that time or location.

June 8, 2016 By Fred Mazelis (WSWS) The UN General Assembly is due to resume its current session tomorrow after being suspended for nine days by a single vote over whether to renew support for Israel’s pre-1967 borders and refusal to recognize the Palestinian people’s right to self-determination. While the United Nations holds no formal powers to negotiate internationally, and is generally seen as a forum for self-important political show-offs, UN Security Council Resolution 242, adopted in 1967, the founding document of the modern Middle East peace process, stipulates a complete Israeli withdrawal from occupied lands in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, a Palestinian capital in Jerusalem and the establishment of a secure “Palestinian state” in the Gaza Strip, West Bank and East Jerusalem, with Israel’s remaining “sovereignty” to be respected. The majority of UN member states, including the United States, the
