Of course, having an always-up-to-date version of the underlying software is an important part of the experience for any web app, and you dont get that with S3 and CloudFront, or even the classic AppStream based setup. AppStream is also a bit complicated and takes more time to set up than CloudFront and S3. Thats where AppCache comes in. I chose the name DailyApp partly because its a cute play on words, and partly because its my name. I was born in the United States in the United States in the country and state of Arkansas, but I was adopted in a culture and family that was Indian. My adoption was when I was 4, so my memories of Indian culture are taken from when I was a child. If you read closely, youll see that the name isn't really clearly Indian, but has several interesting components. This setup will get you to have a great experience using DailyApp. The first thing youll notice about the HTML is that it isnt standard. Youll see a head section, a body section, and a link to index.html, and theres a bunch of text before the head section. What you should be looking at is the CSS, which is followed by a standard style-shebang that lets the browser know which web browser is running the HTML. If youve ever created a webpage on a website and dragged and dropped the files to a local Mac, linux or windows machine, youll notice something different. The browser doesnt know where the fonts and the images are coming from, and thats because Im using the AppCache setup that lets the browser cache the application on the web server so you dont have to hit the back end all the time to serve the content. But where does the font come from? 5ec8ef588b
