Air bag fabrics such as laminate fabrics which contained neoprene fibers and a polyester yarn had greater strength and less susceptibility to electrical discharge than fabrics which contained nylon, rayon, polypropylene, and/or tencelene yarns. However, because of the wide spread of the "fast-to-inflate" air bag fabric, the entire laminate fabric was treated to add neoprene and polyester yarns so that the entire fabric would be compatible with the "fast-to-inflate" concept. For example, the process involved adding neoprene, polyester, and/or polyester/neoprene slivers throughout the fabric to achieve the stated results. If a part of the fabric were damaged or would not be acceptable, it was destroyed rather than the fabric, which may have been unacceptable. For example, the pultruded pieces of the air bag may have been damaged in the cut to form the pultruded parts, the pultruded parts may have experienced thinning of the wall thickness or failure in the forming process. This destroyed fabric also had to be scrapped rather than the entire fabric. Hence, it is desirable to produce an improved pultruded article which can be
