If you are used to working in Lightroom 4, then you will probably think about what's different about Lightroom 5. Adobe has introduced several new features in Lightroom 5, but they haven't been able to keep a grip on the features that have been there since the parade version 3. One of Lightroom's worst flaws is that it's so time-consuming to move a single image. If you fall into that category, you're out of luck. Adobe dropped its tool-inspired drag and drop system from version 4. If you still think that's an advantage, just don't buy Lightroom. An imported image is stored in the import folder on your computer. If you drag and drop an image into Lightroom, it creates a backup via a virtual archive folder and puts two copies of it in your import folder. When you export images to a smaller resolution, Lightroom automatically enhances the image for you. You don't have to use the information provided by Lightroom's improved Lens Correction tool and instead do it yourself. It is obvious that Lightroom 5 is a more powerful application with higher-resolution display and better graphics. The interface is just as easy to use regardless of whether you are a beginner or a professional user. Adobe initially released Lightroom 5 early this year and it had a completely new user interface and a revamped version of Lens Correction. One of the key features of Lightroom is an automatic Slideshow creation engine that uses audio files to play automatically in order to produce a slide show.
