Generatingresponsecodesomnispherekeygen.Q: How do I evaluate my friend? I don't want to interrupt his life, and I respect his privacy. And I don't like the comments that people give him, but I can't ignore them. I can't decide where to stand. I'm a neutral party. How do I evaluate my friend? A: In general, it's much more beneficial to see your friends in normal situations as possible, rather than having them sit in a room and evaluate each other. Do you have some pretty formal meeting where you want to discuss your friend, or could you just go for a walk or a simple coffee? Are there any typical tests you could do together to know where they are? So generally, I'd say: If you see them in a normal context, ask them how they're doing. If they sit down to talk with you about another person, don't interrupt them! Just listen and maybe ask a question or two. If they're acting like immature children, take a step back and let them vent for a bit. If you hear about their private self-evaluation in a casual context (which is probably the easiest to get) and you don't like it, talk to them and try to share your thoughts. Even if you don't like your friend as a person, it's very important to be able to evaluate them in a neutral context. A: Basically, your friend has chosen his own situation. There is
